

Citrix stock is surging this year with a new CEO

More than a year ago, David Henshall, the newly-minted president and CEO of Citrix Systems (CTXS), hatched a plan for the company-known for virtual private networks-to radically transform its business by developing a hybrid-cloud solution to help businesses simplify information-technology environments and link their remote employees to corporate headquarters. Citrix made the switch because it saw a market opportunity to help companies deal with the major shortage of workers globally by delivering digital work spaces that allow people to work flexible schedules and even from home.

To read this article, please visit Barron's.